

Where partners meet...

Home |
 My BabelPort |
 Projects |
 Directories |
 Community

Membership Info

Login

Login

Forgot your password?

Register now

Welcome Members

carmencita

kennan

fieral

Infobox

- >Spanish Translations - What to do when a word doesn't exist
- >How to get listed correctly in the babelport.com directories
- >Working from audio recordings

See all articles>

Navigation

- HOME
- >News
- >Articles
- >Remote News Feed
- >Contact
- >Register
- MY BABELPORT
- PROJECTS
- DIRECTORIES
- COMMUNITY
- TOOLS/EXTRAS
- ABOUT

Read News Article

Of Universal Translators and Babelfishes

Integrate business news on your website free of charge and offer your visitors up-to-date content! Click here for more information.

The last couple of months have brought quite an interest in translation technologies: While statistical machine translation as their data bases grow, academics have released new better understand languages. The roads to Douglas Adams' Universal Translator now seem to have been paved. Alt from computers offering real-time translation in any language announced recently, bringing humanity one step further Scientists at Carnegie Mellon University and the University of Michigan last week debuted a device that translates from Chinese (Mandarin) to English by tracking mouth movements. Interact, the international advanced language and communication technologies, has been working on a host of language- and communication-related technologies, including those that were introduced last week.

After a successful demonstration, Interact program director and Carnegie Mellon University professor Alex Waibel said he foresees a future in which a similar device could be in the throat of individuals who need to communicate regularly across multiple languages.

Using a different device, Alexander Waibel also delivered a lecture simultaneously in English and Spanish by using a microphone.

The technology is rather advanced and could hit the market within a year in a limited form. Translators, however, need further development.

The market for machine translations is increasing despite their current unreliability. Many companies increasingly offer one sort of automated translation or another while intelligence agencies are still using backlogs of wire tapes and media tracking data. Also, technologies offering automated translation are finding their way into medical therapy for deaf people for instance, reading from their lips and translating sign language. However, the applications of such technologies will not be limited to human language service providers, as the human brain's capability to 'read between the lines' for such complex linguistic concepts as sarcasm, analogy or connotations will not be mature in the future, despite science fiction like Star Trek and Douglas Adams' Hitchhiker's Guide.

Read more: Forbes Article, TMCnet